

YOUR HOME AWAY FROM HOME

Exploring Options for Long-Term Living Quarters

By Michael D'Angona

Sometimes a pop-up tent just won't cut it. Extended bugging-out, summer-long hunting trips or a retreat deep into nature will all require a shelter that can withstand the constant pummeling that occurs when Mother Nature flexes her muscles. In addition, a more complex heating system, extra storage space and a greater number of occupants all require a strong, and for all practical purposes, a permanent shelter to call home.

These long-term abodes can be highly diverse in both size and configuration, as well as being positioned on, off and even below ground. The traditional log cabin, built in ready to occupy condition, is suited for the more traditional outdoorsman or outdoorswoman, while a treehouse can bring out the child in others, and still provide security and practicality. For those preppers or survivalists, full-size, comfortable underground bunkers can be created using your unique specifications and personalized requests to match your accustomed style of living. From simple to extravagant, your choices are great, but all will provide what they are intended to; your home away from home.
